

It is time for another part to the journal. And while it seems to me that not a lot happens here, that is not really the case. I managed a couple of different photos on the beach one very still morning. As you can see my style varies depending on my camera settings and I don't think this is a bad thing. The first three photos are a good example of what is possible with a good digital camera and the correct lens.

And the next series of photos are for those who were here at Wonga Beach when the Curlew first layed the eggs but have since moved on. There were two eggs but only one proved viable. The second photo is from the day the chick hatched. The last photo is from three days ago and the chick is about three weeks old. It goes hunting at night with Mum and Dad. And if you can pick which one is Mum and which one is Dad then you are truly gifted and should be an ornithologist. I suppose it is only important to the Curlews when it all comes down to it. And then there is a photo of the reason that the adult birds are very protective of the chick.

My stay at Wonga Beach is drawing to a close and I will be heading south soon. I am looking forward to Christmas on the Sunshine Coast.

The following photos are of Della and Sam's house guest.
A Saint Andrews Cross spider.

This is all for this part of the journal, who knows what will be next. Len.
